oral model, has still influenced much of the legal discourse, especially its focus on the oral subject and hold the person responsible for choices and odds with socially accepted norms. The oral discourse, however, fails to consider how those norms have emerged largely without consideration of the lifeworld of those who often consider the norms. The medical model, at least in theory, focuses on the objective – “understanding the origin and progression of the disease” and seeks to reverse or arrest the development. My focus goes a different way. This model spreads the embodied way of life with addicts as a solution to what is often with the rhetoric of those who practice it.

The harm reduction discourse, a more progressive discourse, has been less clear. While it recognizes the needs of those who struggle with addiction,
